How Participating in a Stock Ownership Plan Affects Employee Absenteeism in Canada

*Stéphane Renaud and Alexandra Rouillard
School of Industrial Relations, Université de Montréal*

Absenteeism in the workplace can be a serious problem for companies because it often involves high and unsuspected social and monetary costs. Absenteeism not only results in direct costs for the firm but may also trigger other negative effects such as slower production, accumulation of work, additional pressure on other workers, higher risk of accidents, schedule delays and inferior quality (Drapeau, 1988; Peel and Wilson, 1990). Even a slight reduction in absenteeism can generate substantial savings (Gesine, 1992).

For companies seeking a wise solution to the problem of absenteeism, the research is contradictory and confusing. The literature mentions a number of ways to counter the problem, including disciplinary measures, job enrichment, reorganization of work and stock ownership. The goal of this research is to see whether stock ownership plans have an impact on absenteeism.

The above is a summary of a full article available at List of articles and case studies.
