

Poultry - Internet Resource List

Computerized Poultry Information

Computer access to poultry information can be through "news groups", "web sites" and "email". "News groups" allow you to exchange information with a community of similar interests. Information arrives via your email automatically each day once you are set up. When you access a "news group" the questions and comments you send go automatically to everyone who is a member of the "news group".

You can also access information from a large number of Internet information sites through the "World Wide Web" (www) by typing in the "www address" of the site on the Internet. Subjects on the Internet are often linked via "hypertext" which may appear as text in a different colour than the "background text". Clicking your mouse on "hypertext" allows you to "surf" the web for "linkages" to other information on the same subject. To contact a specific individual for information you need to obtain their "email address". When using the Internet, users should operate by the rules of "netiquette", the etiquette of the Internet. An Internet address which explains "netiquette" is provided below, under "INTERNET SKILLS".
