¹ Excerpts from the Mission document of the Correctional Service of Canada

After the publication of the practical guide on Successful Community Reintegration which was very well received, I am very pleased to introduce a second publication entitled A Bridge towards Community Reintegration which is an essential complement to the aforementioned publication. It contains information on different ethnocultural communities and organizations and a directory of business contacts. This directory was developed from the results of research made by different organizations that show where there is a high need in employment. A sample of companies was selected from different public sources such as Industry Canada Website and other ethnocultural business pages available on Internet or in hardcopy. This handbook is also available in electronic version that is accessible at: <http://www.csc-scc.gc.ca/ethnoculture>

I would like to thank all of you including the Canadian Heritage Department who have contributed in different ways to the development of this essential tool in the community reintegration of all individuals who may have spent time behind bars or who are newcomers in our respective community.

This handbook will certainly help offenders find the bridge towards their successful community reintegration. It is then their own responsibility, as adult persons, to take advantage of this new tool and to ask for any help and assistance.

As you may know, most of Canada's federal offenders serve only part of their sentences in prison. Part of the time, they serve in the community, adhering to certain conditions and supervised by professional staff of the Correctional Service of Canada (CSC). On any given day there may be about 12,300 offenders in prison and another 8,300 on some form of conditional release. Such work is essential because experience has shown most offenders are more likely to become law-abiding citizens if they participate in a program of gradual, supervised release. The Correctional Service of Canada is dedicated to protecting society by controlling offenders and by helping them change the attitudes and behaviours that led them into criminal activity. The first steps towards change are taken in the prison setting. But if the change is to be lasting, it must continue in the community to which almost all offenders eventually return. The transition from confinement to freedom can be difficult, and offenders have a better chance of success if they receive supervision, opportunities, training and support within the community to which they must readjust.

In doing its work, CSC must take and really takes the safety concerns and human rights of many groups into account. These include: the general public, crime victims, CSC staff and even offenders themselves. All these groups have specific needs and rights that must be balanced. Offenders have a right to humane treatment, therefore the Corrections and Conditional Release Act directs CSC not to use measures more restrictive than necessary in administering an offender's sentence. At the same time, other groups must be protected from any safety threats that offenders might pose. Key to achieving the balance is assessing and managing risk.

The skills, resources and experiences of many different people and ethnocultural organizations/communities are highly needed to deal with offenders' complex problems and needs. Therefore, CSC draws upon a broad range of organizations and individuals - family members, psychologists, criminologists, social workers, employment counsellors, educators, business people and so on - to assist in community correctional work. Such community networks contribute to both supervision and support and success of the community reintegration.

This handbook is one of the various tools developed by CSC that anyone is invited to use before trying to cross the bridge towards community reintegration. The electronic version of this handbook will be regularly updated. I encourage all readers to go beyond this handbook and find new and innovative ways to complete and enrich the community resources and business contact directory during their journey towards community reintegration. Good luck!
