

A true artist is someone who is not dependant on technology

Jennifer Dickson – Clip 7

A true artist is someone who is not dependant on technology. Technology is only as useful or as good as the brain behind it, I learned that from Stanley William Hayter. Photography is no substitute for intelligence, talent and an ability to make decisions. Any great artist uses only the technology that is essential to realize the intellectual or creative goal. I do use some digital technology in my new printmaking media but I am well aware that technology on its own is an empty vessel.
