Being a Women Artist: Granddaughter remembers grandmother, artist Paraskeva Clark

I sometimes think about what she would think if she saw this happening...she would be...shocked. She really, at the end of her life felt that it was impossible for women to be great artists. I remember, that's the one thing I remember her really... saying, that hit me when I was young, you know she said: "Women will never be really great artists because they have to divided loyalties, they can't just lock themselves up in a room and focus on the work and on nothing else." And yet, I think now, we begin to realise that is the value of women's work - is that they don't lock themselves up in a room and close out all kinds of other experiences and focus on only their art. So I think that the shifts that are taking place there, are things that would be fascinating to see her react to the works that are being made today.
