“It is time to have a more principled approach toward whether and in which way relationships should be considered by the State so that it stays out of the bedrooms of the nation.”

Questioning the Law

Message from the President

To question a wise man, says a German proverb, is the beginning of wisdom. Hence, any type of reform requires rigorous questioning of the state of things, and in-depth reflection on the why and how.

In this spirit, the Law Commission of Canada presents its annual report for the year 2001–2002, with the theme of reflection and questioning. To question the law means questioning the fundamental concepts that structure our law to determine whether they continue to effectively reflect the realities of life.

The Commission's research plan is structured around four broad themes: personal relationships, social relationships, economic relationships and governance relationships. These themes intentionally extend beyond the traditional understanding of the categories of the law (e.g. family law, criminal law and labour law) toward an examination that is without taboos or private preserves. It is a question of reflecting in an unbiased way on the effects of the law and of questioning the why of concepts in the law that, in many instances, appear sacrosanct.

Indeed, the structural notions of the law often have exclusionary effects. They frequently mask the reality of less affluent citizens. The question therefore is for whom does the law work? Furthermore, we must challenge the relevance and efficacy of categorizations the law considers fundamental. In many cases, the concepts used by the law no longer correspond to the way society is organized and the way people view their responsibilities and relationships. This variance between the law and society undermines the confidence of citizens and contributes to the inefficiency of the law. Reform is aimed at eliminating the gap between the life of citizens and their law. Accordingly, the Commission has focused primarily on three broad issues: Why are personal relationships between citizens always organized around the notion of conjugality? How is the community conceptualized within the framework of our social relationships? And finally, "What is a crime?"

These major questions must be asked in the context of citizen engagement: it is they who reflect on and redefine the fundamental concepts of the law through their actions, words and gestures. The Commission continues to aim for a consultative, partnership-based and multidisciplinary methodology for questioning the law.

Personal Relationships

Beyond Conjuality

Canadian legislation and legal thinking use the notion of marriage to designate personal relationships between adults that suggest economic or emotional interdependence. Over the years, in many laws, marriage has often been replaced by notions of “conjuality” directed at common-law spouses, irrespective of their sexual orientation.

What are the consequences of the predominance of conjuality as the organizing concept of our law? Is it advisable to continue limiting recognition of personal relationships between adults to conjugal relationships, structuring it on this basis, and ignoring other affective personal relationships? The Law Commission of Canada report entitled Beyond Conjuality examines the legal framework that characterizes our law to this day.

The two-part report is the result of several years of research and consultations on these questions. The first part of the report proposes a methodological framework (see box, below) that should

Norman:

No, my mother’s there.

Carla:

Oooooowwwhhhh!
You are definitely a sensitive guy, my dear Norman. It’s so sweet of you to put your mother up. How long will she be staying for?

Norman:

Forever.

*Excerpt from the play
“Through the Key Hole”*

Framework for the Future

The suggested methodology recommends:

- reflecting about the proposed objectives. Are they legitimate?
- questioning the relevance of personal relationships in achieving these objectives. For example, in the Employment Insurance Act or the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, is it necessary to refer to personal relationships to achieve their objectives?

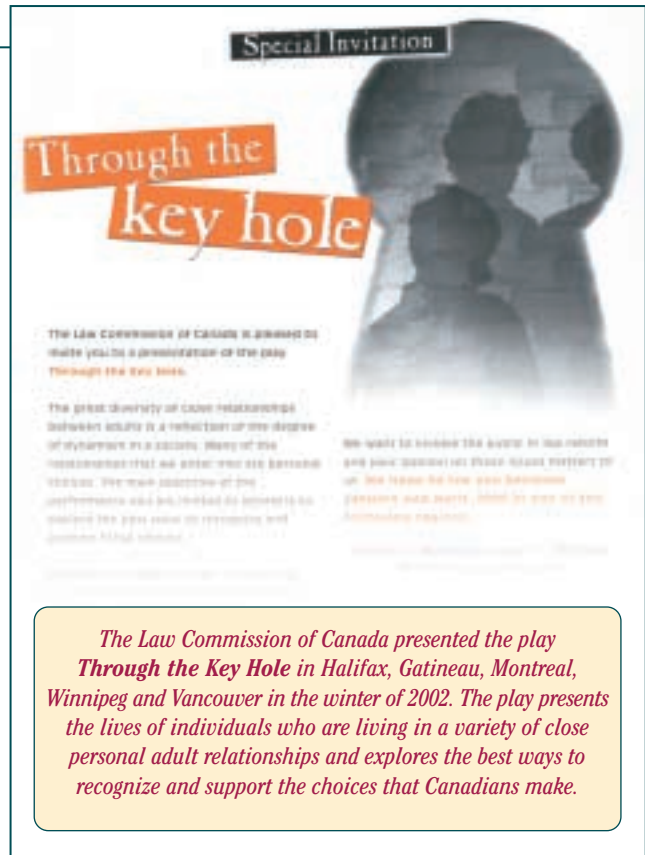

If personal relationships are relevant, our methodology suggests that governments assess whether or not citizens themselves could choose to designate the persons who are dear to them, and who should benefit from government support.

If governments must consider psychological or economic interdependence relationships, they ought to do so by using functional rather than matrimonial “status” criteria.

not only help governments reflect on current policies and programs, but also guide future efforts. The report applies this methodology to various fields, including tax laws, the Canada Evidence Act, the Canada Labour Code and the Canada Pension Plan.

The second part of the report deals with the legal framework of personal relationships. Marriage is virtually the sole existing mechanism that provides a framework for personal relationships.

This mechanism is no longer sufficient. The Commission therefore recommends that systems be established to register personal relationships so that citizens who do not wish to marry may benefit from an accessible, trouble-free legal framework. These systems could provide agreement models that are suited to a range of relationships. The Commission also recommends that heterosexual limits imposed on the legal notion of marriage be re-examined.

Special Invitation

Through the key hole

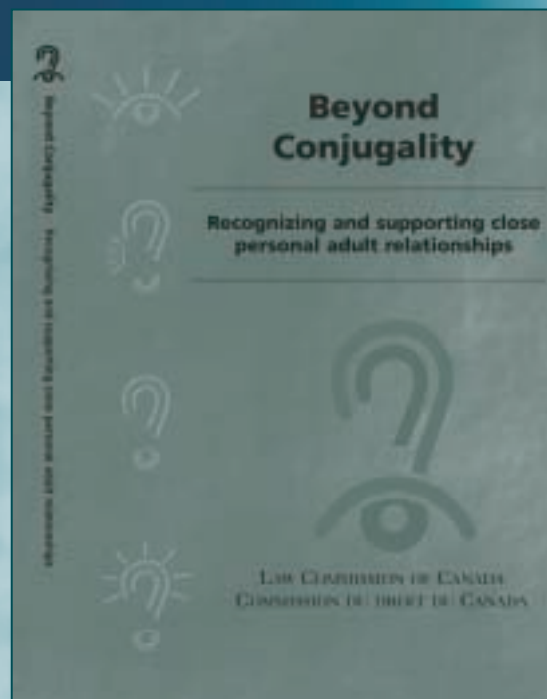

The Law Commission of Canada is pleased to invite you to a presentation of the play Through the Key Hole.

The great diversity of close relationships between adults is a reflection of the degree of dynamism in a society. Many of the relationships that we enter into are beyond "marriage." We have questions of the "common law" and we need to know how to deal with the legal consequences of these relationships.

We want to involve the public in the debate and your comments are most welcome. Please contact us at the following address:

Through the Key Hole is a play by the author of The Law Commission of Canada's Report on the Law of Marriage.

The Law Commission of Canada presented the play Through the Key Hole in Halifax, Gatineau, Montreal, Winnipeg and Vancouver in the winter of 2002. The play presents the lives of individuals who are living in a variety of close personal adult relationships and explores the best ways to recognize and support the choices that Canadians make.

Social Relationships

What are Communities?

Social relationships are increasingly woven at the community level. More and more, governments are calling on local communities to find possible solutions to various problems. Communities, therefore, are no longer merely groups in which government policies and programs are implemented. Governments and communities are thus working in partnership to carry out numerous initiatives.

While the artisans of government policy seek to entrust additional responsibility to communities in matters of governance, traditional notions of what constitutes a community are called into question. Canadian society is becoming increasingly compartmentalized in terms of age, race, gender, nationality, culture, sexual orientation, interests and religion. The fragmentation of communities is intensifying as their social relationships become more strained. Paradoxically, whereas the concept of community seems to be a magnet for the development of policy by decision makers, the sociological reality of the community is becoming increasingly ambiguous.

In 2001–2002, the Commission carried out a number of research projects on the subject of communities (see page 14 for details).

“Communities want a say in what goes on, in the solutions to the systemic issues that crime often represent.”

Restorative Justice: Its Promise, Its Challenges, and Its Place in a Democratic Society, speech by Nathalie Des Rosiers at the 2001 Conference on Restorative Justice

Restorative Justice

Restorative justice is a process of transformation during which the parties move backward to the situation that existed before the conflict. The process is also designed to modify the power relationship between the parties (i.e. to transform the relationship and render it more egalitarian).

This exercise of transformation must take place at the community level. Individuals cannot transform their relationships unless they put them back into the context of their lives as members of the community. The Commission has produced a video entitled Communities and the Challenge of Conflict: Perspectives on Restorative Justice to facilitate its consultations throughout Canada.

In Search of Security: The Roles of Public Police and Private Agencies

Even before September 11, Canadians were concerned about security. In certain segments of society, security and safety are bought like commodities. We buy intruder detection alarm systems and install bars on our windows. We hire security guards to patrol our communities. We install surveillance cameras in public spaces. We do these things as individuals, as communities, or as businesses to minimize the risk.

The Law Commission of Canada's discussion paper In Search of Security: The Roles of Public Police and Private Agencies examines the changes occurring in the provision of security to Canadians. It reviews security arrangements in Canada and the growth of networks of policing involving both public and private actors.

The Commission produced this video to allow Canadians across the country to learn about the subject of restorative justice and participate in consultations. The 34-minute video, which was released with a study guide, explores the possibility of using restorative justice to help build stronger and more vibrant communities. The individuals appearing in the video present different views on restorative justice.

Economic Relationships

Marginalized Work

The law plays an important role in determining the type of work that will be recognized, valued and rewarded, or, conversely, belittled, ignored and forbidden. Does the law recognize a sufficiently broad range of types of work? On what basis does the law recognize and reward certain kinds of work or certain categories of workers, and not others? What are the legal and economic consequences of an absence of recognition?

The concept of marginalized work is used in its broad sense to describe certain irregular, transient, part-time and atypical jobs. Various types of work, such as moonlighting, fast-food industry services, homemaker services and some kinds of agricultural work and prostitution must be analysed separately to determine the role of the law in the pursuit of economic security.

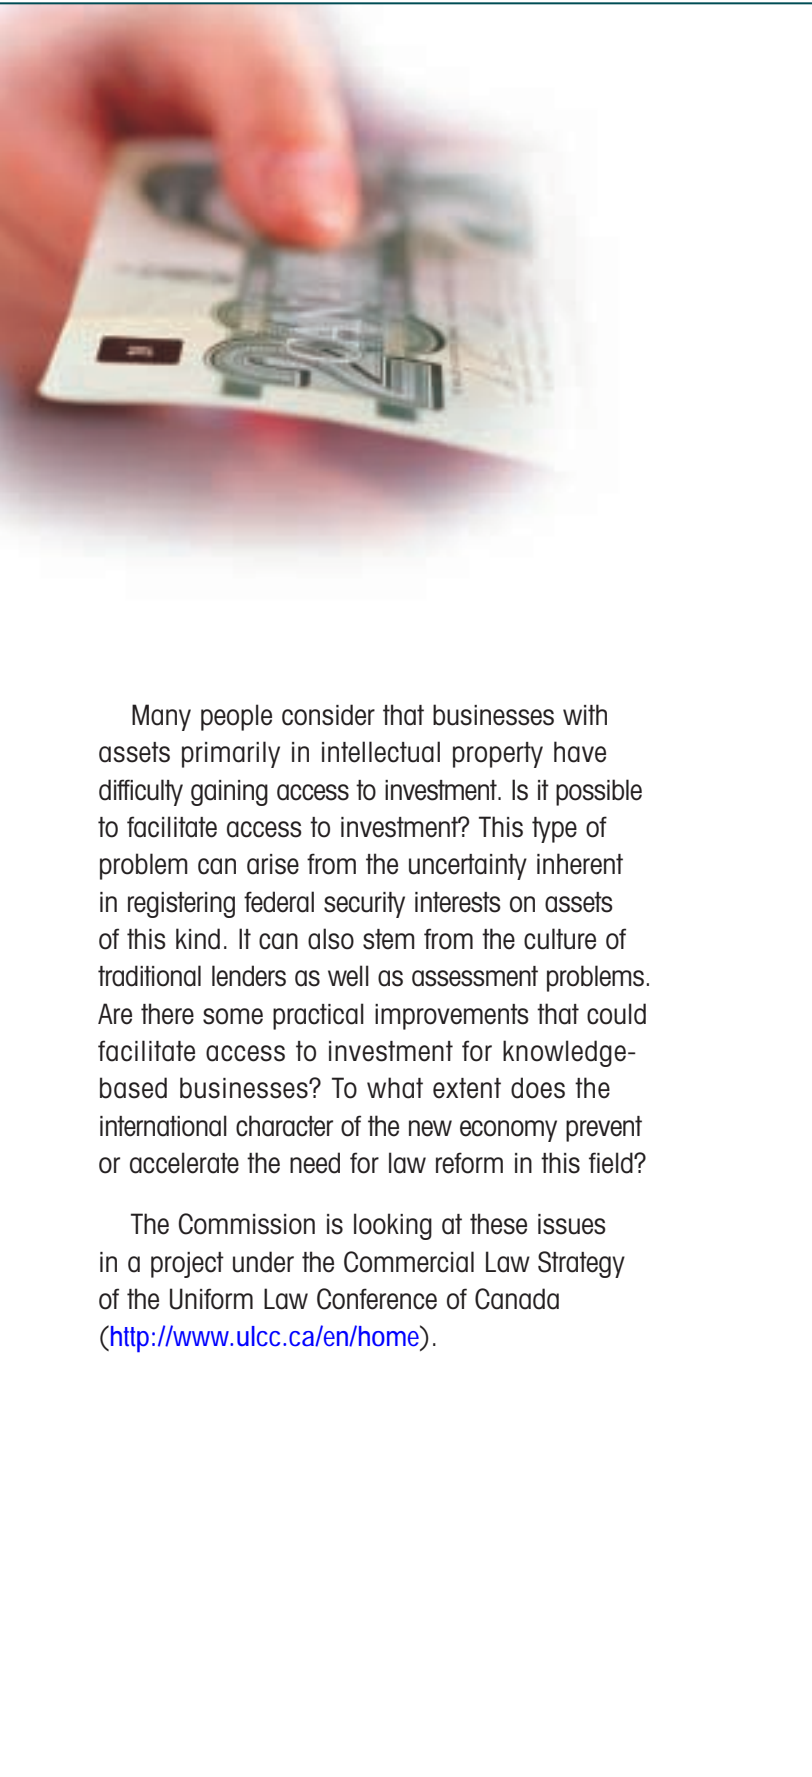

In 2001–2002, the Commission carried out a number of research projects on the subject of marginalized work.

Leveraging Knowledge Assets

The nature of wealth has changed. While wealth was previously based on land and real estate rights, and then on market values, it is now at the mercy of knowledge. Has the infrastructure of commercial law evolved along with these changes?

The Law Commission of Canada presented, with the Richard Ivey School of Business and Faculty of Law at the University of Western Ontario, a conference on security interests in intellectual property. Leveraging Knowledge Assets, which was held in London in November 2001, was attended by business leaders looking to increase investment in their firms based on knowledge assets and the lawyers who advise them on intellectual property matters.

Many people consider that businesses with assets primarily in intellectual property have difficulty gaining access to investment. Is it possible to facilitate access to investment? This type of problem can arise from the uncertainty inherent in registering federal security interests on assets of this kind. It can also stem from the culture of traditional lenders as well as assessment problems. Are there some practical improvements that could facilitate access to investment for knowledge-based businesses? To what extent does the international character of the new economy prevent or accelerate the need for law reform in this field?

The Commission is looking at these issues in a project under the Commercial Law Strategy of the Uniform Law Conference of Canada (<http://www.ulcc.ca/en/home>).

Lessons of Everyday Law

The Law Commission of Canada is pleased to announce the publication of Lessons of Everyday Law by Roderick A. Macdonald.

Lessons of Everyday Law includes some 20 stories about the law. Professor Macdonald, the first president of the Law Commission of Canada, uses these short stories drawn from everyday life to illustrate the great dilemmas of law reform: Should we have more rules? Who should settle disputes and how? What are the functions of the law in our society?

Lessons of Everyday Law is published in partnership with McGill-Queen's University Press on behalf of the Law Commission of Canada and the School of Policy Studies at Queen's University.

Governance Relationships

Fiduciary Relationships

The relationship between the First Nations and the Crown represents more than 500 years of complex relations and tension. The Supreme Court of Canada has described this type of relationship as “fiduciary.”

However, the use of the label “fiduciary” has not clarified the mutual obligations it implies, nor has it resulted in greater feelings of trust, optimism and satisfaction regarding this relationship for many First Nations communities.

A joint conference of the Association of Iroquois and Allied Indians and the Commission aimed to clarify the nature of this complex relationship, verify the relevance of its premises and propose a framework for the future. Several concentric lines of research provided direction for reflection: perspectives on the fiduciary report, the experience of this report and its future.

“The capacity of citizens to participate meaningfully in the democratic process poses challenges for the design of public institutions.

Increasingly, Canadians are disengaging from these institutions, and, in the process, becoming more sceptical about the government’s capacity to respond to legitimate expectations.”

Bijuralism

“Bijuralism invites creativity. In studying two legal traditions, one cannot help but be intrigued by the similarities and the differences between the systems. ... [Bijuralism] allows for [one] system to reveal itself as it is contrasted to the other. ... It is possible to imagine difference, difference in thinking, difference in solutions, difference in concepts. ... Bijuralism leads to transcending legal categories and a reflection on general principles.

In the end, this ability to think beyond the legal box is what all law schools seek to instil in their students: to know the limits of the box, what is in it, how it works, but also to reflect on what could be in it, how the box could be enlarged or its shape modified. Thinking outside of the box is helped by looking into different boxes...”

Nathalie Des Rosiers, Reflections on Bijuralism and Law Reform, speech at a seminar on bijuralism and the teaching of law at the Law Center, Louisiana State University, November 2, 2001.

Reform of Democratic Institutions

Canadians have less confidence than in the past in the capacity of the democratic process to meet their legitimate expectations, and they hesitate to become involved. Among other things, does the electoral process as experienced by Canadians meet their needs? Does it facilitate or hinder participation in public life? What do citizens expect of a voting system?

The Law Commission of Canada proposes to foster public dialogue on alternatives to the current voting system. It will offer citizens the opportunity to voice their opinions on the values that should serve as a vehicle for Canada's voting system and democratic institutions.

Interested Canadians can take part in the Commission's electoral reform project through the Commission's Web site (http://www.lcc.gc.ca/en/themes/gr/er/er_main.asp).

TERRORISM, LAW & DEMOCRACY

How is Canada changing following September 11?

The Law Commission of Canada co-sponsored a two-day conference called Terrorism, Law and Democracy: How is Canada Changing Following September 11? Organized by the Canadian Institute for the Administration of Justice, the conference was held in March in Montreal and featured panel discussions and community forums open to the public with Canadian and international experts on maintaining the balance between protecting public security and fundamental rights.

What is a Crime?

Why do we view certain acts as criminal and not others? What are the legal, social and cultural factors that influence decisions about whether or not to criminalize undesirable behaviour? Why do certain actions appear to be a question of legality, health, education or lifestyle?

The objective of the project entitled "What is a Crime?" is to develop a conceptual framework to understand the processes surrounding and underlying our reaction to undesirable behaviour, including the consequences of choosing certain behaviours and control mechanisms (i.e. the official legal process, regulatory codes, health and education programs and decriminalization).

Criminal law is only one way to regulate behaviour. Labelling an act as a crime produces certain possibilities for reacting to this behaviour, while ruling out others. As a society, we have a range of options for dealing with undesirable behaviour that is not subject to any official sanction or regulatory process. For example, in our daily lives, we develop our own informal control strategies; we tolerate certain types of behaviour and avoid others that displease us. Occasionally, we confront those who irritate us, whereas at other times, we simply choose to do nothing.

The question "What is a crime?" cannot be examined without questioning what has and has not been designated as "criminal." The qualifier "criminal" is frequently applied to the faults and offences committed by young people, minorities and the less fortunate, whereas the more powerful in our society are immune from this epithet.

As part of the "What is a Crime?" project, legal scholars were asked to write a paper on this important question. The winners of the contest for legal scholars were announced in March 2001 (see Winners of the 2002 "Legal Dimensions" Contest).

Management Report

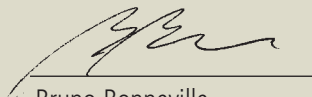

Statement of Management Responsibility

Responsibility for the integrity and objectivity of the accompanying financial statements for the year ended March 31, 2002 and all information contained in this report rests with management.

These statements have been prepared in accordance with Treasury Board Accounting Standards based upon generally accepted accounting principles, using management's best estimates and judgements where appropriate. Readers of these statements are cautioned that the financial statements are not necessarily complete; certain assets, liabilities and expenses are only recorded at a government-wide level at this time. These statements should be read within the context of the significant accounting policies set out in the Notes.

Management has developed and maintains books, records, internal controls and management practices, designed to provide reasonable assurance that the Government's assets are safeguarded and controlled, that resources are managed economically and efficiently in the attainment of corporate objectives, and that transactions are in accordance with the Financial Administration Act and regulations as well as the Commission policies and statutory requirements.

The transactions and financial statements of the Commission have not been audited.

Notes to the Financial Statements

1. Authority and purpose

The mandate of the Law Commission of Canada is derived from the Law Commission of Canada Act, which came into force in 1997.

The Commission's expenditures are funded by an annual appropriation from Parliament.

2. Significant accounting policies

These financial statements have been prepared in accordance with Generally Accepted Accounting Principles to the extent that they are in accordance with Government policies and directives. Readers of these statements are cautioned that the introduction of accrual accounting at the departmental level is evolutionary. Not all assets, liabilities and expenses applicable to the department are recorded at this time thus the financial statements are not necessarily complete. All such assets, liabilities and expenses are recorded at a government-wide level in the financial statements of the Government of Canada. The accompanying notes provide additional detail and should be read with care.

The significant accounting policies include the following:

(a) Parliamentary appropriations

The Commission is primarily financed by the Government of Canada through Parliamentary appropriations. Appropriations provided to the Commission do not parallel financial reporting according to generally accepted accounting principles as they are, in a large part, based on cash flow requirements. Consequently, items recognized in the statement of operations and the statement of financial position are not necessarily the same as those provided through appropriations from Parliament. Note 7 to these financial statements provides information regarding the source and disposition of these authorities.

(b) Net cash provided by government

All departments including agencies and departmental corporations operate within the Consolidated Revenue Fund (CRF) which is administered by the Receiver General for Canada. All cash receipts are deposited to the CRF and all cash disbursements made by departments are paid from the CRF. Net cash provided by government is the difference between all cash receipts and all cash disbursements including transactions between departments.

(c) Use of estimates

The preparation of financial statements requires management to make estimates and assumptions that affect the reported amounts of assets, liabilities, revenues and expenses reported in the financial statements. At the time of preparation of these statements, management believes the estimates and assumptions to be reasonable.

(d) Basis of financial reporting

All expense transactions and any related asset and liability accounts between sub-entities within the department have been eliminated.

(e) Expenses

Expenses are recorded when the underlying transaction or expense occurred subject to the following:

- Employee termination benefits are expensed by the Commission when paid. Estimated accruals are not recorded at the Commission level rather they are recognized in the consolidated financial statements of the Government of Canada.
- Vacation pay and overtime are expensed in the year that the entitlement occurs.
- Contributions to superannuation plans are recognized in the period that the contributions are made. Actuarial surpluses or deficiencies are not recorded in the Commission's books but are recognized in the consolidated financial statements of the Government of Canada.
- Services provided without charge by other government departments and agencies are not recorded as operating expenses rather, they are disclosed in a note to the statements. (See note 6)

(f) Foreign currency transactions

Transactions involving foreign currencies are translated into Canadian dollar equivalents using rates of exchange in effect at the time of those transactions.

3. Changes in accounting policies

In previous years, the Commission prepared its financial results in terms of source and disposition of appropriations. This is the first year that a set of financial statements including a Statement of Financial Position, a Statement of Operations and a Statement of Cash Flow has been prepared on a full-accrual accounting basis. Comparative amounts for vacation pay and accumulated overtime are not presented since the information is not available and any estimation would not be able to be substantiated with any degree of precision.

4. Related party transactions

The Commission is related in terms of common ownership to all Government of Canada departments, agencies, and Crown corporations. The Commission enters into transactions with these entities in the normal course of business. Certain of these transactions are on normal trade terms applicable to all individuals and enterprises, while others are services provided without charge to the Commission. (See note 6)
