Grade 5 students and members of the Ontario government and police services talked about Internet safety at Lansdowne Junior and Senior Public School in Toronto on February 13. With the children (from left to right) are Attorney General Chris Bentley, Ontario Provincial Police Commissioner Julian Fantino, MPP for Etobicoke-Lakeshore Laurel Broten, and Minister of Community Safety and Correctional Services Rick Bartolucci.

Minister Bartolucci: We're going to conclude now, we're going to draw this to an end. But I didn't know, Minister Bentley didn't know and I'm finding out that Laurel didn't know, that you have your own language. Commissioner Fantino knows because he monitors it to make sure that it's appropriate language.

But you have your own language, so let me just ask you a couple of questions.

What does "kk" stand for?

Student: Okay.

Minister Bartolucci: Ok, cool, nice going! Congratulations.

What does "nvm" stand for?

Student: Never mind.

Minister Bartolucci: Alright! Did you realize this?

Minister Bentley: Not until I read the pamphlet!

Minister Bartolucci: And finally, "ppl." What does "ppl" stand for?

Student: People.

Minister Bartolucci: People.

And in conclusion, let's be very, very careful when we're on cyberspace about the people we interact with. And that message comes from your parents, your teachers, the wonderful police officers that help protect you and the Government of Ontario.

Thank you so much for inviting us to spend some time with you today. We have thoroughly enjoyed the experience and Mr Tran, you have a wonderful school, you should be very, very proud of the tone you've set in this school.
