The Canada Project is a multi-year program of research and dialogue designed to help leading decision-makers chart a policy course to improve Canada's standard of living and position within North America and the world. Spearheaded by the Conference Board and launched in January 2003, The Canada Project was a unique combination of research and dialogue designed to actively engage private and public leaders in setting national policy direction. More than 40 companies and organizations invested in the project, providing invaluable financial, leadership and knowledge support.

The final report, a four-volume compendium of the research results and recommendations entitled Mission Possible: Sustainable Prosperity for Canada, was previewed in the November 27th issue of Maclean's which stated that the report is "perhaps the most comprehensive attempt to reimagine the Canadian economy since the Macdonald Commission more that 20 years ago."

The full final report encompassing three volumes plus a separate executive summary was released in January 2007 and is available for downloading on the Conference Board of Canada website.
