SCOPE AND CONTENT

The papers of Sir Robert Bond, Prime Minister of Newfoundland from 1900 to 1909, are a mixture of personal and political papers ranging from before his birth to after his death. The papers before his birth relate to Bond's father, John Bond, and include correspondence and a diary. The papers after Bond's death relate to the disposition of his estate and the interpretation of his will. There are papers documenting his education, legal training and practice, financial and business dealings, mineral and timber speculation, various personal interests, and ownership of the Grange, his estate at Whitbourne. There is extensive correspondence with his brother George, a Methodist clergyman, and with other family members.

The bulk of the papers are concerned with Bond's involvement in Newfoundland politics from 1882 when he was first elected to the Newfoundland House of Assembly to 1914 when he resigned. There are political papers after that date which reflect his interest in Newfoundland politics after he had ceased to be an active participant. The political papers cover both constituency and government affairs, and include material related to various election campaigns, the Liberal Party, the fishery, the railway, mineral exploration, the economy, and foreign policy. There is correspondence between Bond and the major political figures of the time, including Sir William V. Whiteway, Sir William F. Coaker, Sir Edward P. Morris, Sir William Horwood, George Shea, Sir Alfred B. Morine, Governor Sir Cavendish Boyle, Governor Sir William MacGregor, Governor Sir Henry Blake and a host of others. There is also correspondence from his constituents and other Newfoundlanders concerned with national and local issues.

Specific issues documented in these papers include the Bait Act of 1888, the controversy with Great Britain and France over the French Shore, and negotiations on free trade with the United States (Bond-Blaine Convention in 1890 and Bond-Hay Convention in 1902), all of which are intertwined with the coastal fishery. There is also documentation of Bond's political involvement with education, agricultural and mineral development, trade, native peoples, relations between Newfoundland and Canada, the Bank Crash, and the development of transportation and communication. There are extensive newspaper clippings, both in books and loose, which Bond kept; some were grouped by subject, others by date.

Photographs in the collection provide a visual record of Bond from a small child to an elderly man. Photographs also document the Grange, various Newfoundland communities, special occasions, and family members.

Biographers, political historians, social historians, political scientists and researchers interested in almost any aspect of Newfoundland between 1880 and 1930 will find this is an important and valuable body of material.

BIOGRAPHY

Robert Bond was born in St. John's, Newfoundland, on February 26, 1857. He was the youngest of four sons born to Elizabeth Roberts and John Bond; his father was a native of Kingskerswell, Devon, England, who had immigrated to St. John's in the late 1820s to work for Samuel Codner's mercantile establishment. Robert received his early education in St. John's. In April 1872, at the age of 15, he was enrolled in Queen's College at Taunton, Somerset, England, and consequently graduated in 1874. Returning to St. John's he entered into articles of clerkship with William V. Whiteway on December 11, 1874, two months before his 18th birthday. Under Whiteway's tutelage, Bond read for the law but was never called to the bar.

Whiteway was a well-respected attorney and member of the Newfoundland House of Assembly when Bond first joined his firm. In 1878 Whiteway became Prime Minister of Newfoundland. It was probably Whiteway's influence and support which enticed the 25 year old Bond to stand for election to the House of Assembly in 1882. He was elected as one of the three members for Trinity district; it was to be his full-time occupation for the next 32 years.

Bond entered the House of Assembly during a decade of turbulence and change. On December 26, 1883 a clash between Roman Catholics and Protestant Orangemen in Harbour Grace resulted in the deaths of five persons. Attempts to prosecute persons charged in the incident ended in failure as witness after witness was discredited. When Alfred Penny, the Protestant Member of the House of Assembly for Carbonear, introduced an amendment to the Speech from the Throne condemning the miscarriage of justice arising out of the Harbour Grace Affray, the House of Assembly soon split along denominational lines. Whiteway's Roman Catholic supporters were opposed to the amendment and to a compromise amendment proposed by Whiteway. They all resigned from Whiteway's party and sat in opposition as Independent Liberals.

One of the members to resign was the Speaker of the House, Robert Kent. Consequently, Whiteway then appointed Bond to this position. Bond did not hold the position for long, however, as Whiteway resigned as Prime Minister a few months later. The new Prime Minister, Robert Thorburn, had the House of Assembly dissolved and a new election was held on October 31, 1885. Whiteway announced that he would not offer himself as a candidate in the election. Most of his supporters had deserted him, the Protestants becoming part of Thorburn's new Reform Party, which promised no coalition with the Roman Catholics. As a result, the Roman Catholics formed their own party, the Liberals. Bond remained loyal to Whiteway, however, and in the end ran as an independent in Fortune Bay district where he was elected without opposition. The next four years were quiet ones for Bond as he settled into his position as a member of the opposition. He participated in the debates in the House of Assembly and dealt with the concerns of his constituents.

Shortly after the election, Thorburn had a change of heart on his promise not to enter into a coalition with the Roman Catholic members of the assembly. In 1886 he invited several of them to join his cabinet and they accepted. By 1889, however, the Reform Party had fallen out of favour with the electorate. In an election held that year they elected only five members to the 36-member assembly. Thorburn and all members of his cabinet, Protestant and Roman Catholic alike, were defeated.

The new Prime Minister was William V. Whiteway who had come out of retirement to lead a newly constituted Liberal Party with members from all denominations. Bond was re-elected in Trinity and entered Whiteway's cabinet as Colonial Secretary. One of Bond's first actions in this position was to attempt to settle the French Shore issue, a problem which had plagued Newfoundland fishermen for almost two hundred years. At the end of Queen Anne's War in 1713, the Treaty of Utrecht forced France to recognize Britain's sovereignty over all of Newfoundland, including an end to French settlements along the south coast. In return French fishermen were given a right to catch and cure fish along the stretch of coast ranging from Cape Bonavista north to Point Riche on the western side of the Great Northern Peninsula. In 1783 the eastern terminus of the French Shore was moved northward from Cape Bonavista to Cape St. John, and extended from Point Riche south along the western coast of the island to Cape Ray.

Newfoundlanders had been arguing for the right to fish and to establish settlements along the French Shore for many years, and despite French objections such fishing and settlement had occurred. In the late 1880s a dispute arose over who had what rights to fish for lobster along the French Shore. The French claimed an exclusive right to all fisheries while Newfoundlanders claimed the French had no right to catch lobsters. Britain and France, without informing the Newfoundland government, entered into negotiations, which in 1890 resulted in an Anglo-French modus vivendi (temporary agreement), allowing for concurrent lobster fisheries. The Newfoundland Government was outraged that this agreement, reached without its knowledge, was put into place without its consent. Bond was a member of the delegation led by Whiteway which travelled to London that summer to attempt to find a solution to the lobster question and other related issues. However, all they managed to obtain was permission to enter into negotiations with the United States on a trade agreement. The problem of the French on the west coast of Newfoundland, or the French Shore Question as it came to be known, would plague the Newfoundland government for the rest of the decade.

Newfoundland had been an economic beneficiary of the reciprocity treaty between the United States and Great Britain from 1855 to 1866. Newfoundland and the United States had various agreements during the ensuing decades, particularly the provisions of the Treaty of Washington signed in 1871. Bond and the United States Secretary of State, James G. Blaine, quickly reached an agreement on the terms for a treaty, which became known as the "Bond-Blaine Convention". It gave American ships the right to procure bait and supplies and engage crews in Newfoundland, while, in return, Newfoundland fish products and crude minerals would be admitted to American markets duty-free. The proposed treaty was to take effect as soon as it was ratified by the British and American Governments.

The Canadian government, however, protested the Bond-Blaine Convention, claiming that it was detrimental to Canadian interests. Bond attempted to make concessions, but the British government eventually vetoed the agreement, stating that there should be no trade agreements negotiated by Newfoundland which would in any way be detrimental to other British North American interests. A major consequence of this action was the souring of relations between Newfoundland and Canada for several years.

After four years of relative prosperity, Prime Minister Whiteway called a general election for November 6, 1893. He and his party returned to power with an overwhelming majority winning 23 of 36 seats. Bond was re-elected by the voters of Trinity. On January 6, 1894 the Conservative Party filed petitions in the Supreme Court against fifteen of the successful Liberal candidates charging them with bribery and corruption under the Corrupt Practices Act. One of those charged was Bond. His case came before the Supreme Court and on July 25 he was unseated as member for Trinity and barred from running for election to the House of Assembly. So, too, was Whiteway who had resigned as Prime Minister on April 11 when the Governor refused to grant his request for a dissolution of the House. The Governor, Sir Terence O'Brien, invited Augustus Goodridge, the Conservative leader in the House of Assembly, to form a new administration. He agreed even though the Conservatives had only 12 seats in the legislature to the Liberals 22.

During the spring and summer of 1894, more of the Liberal members were found guilty under the Act and were unseated and disqualified from running. However, other Liberals were elected in their place in the by-elections which followed. Goodridge held on to power throughout the summer and fall by keeping the House of Assembly prorogued. It was November 12 before the last by-election was held, and with its completion, the Conservatives had made a net gain of one seat from the 1893 general election results. It was another month before Goodridge resigned as Prime Minister. His resignation was prompted more by the failure of Newfoundland's two commercial banks two days prior, rather than by the standings in the legislature. The Bank Crash of December 10, 1894 resulted in the closing of the Union and the Commercial Banks. The Crash also resulted in the bankruptcy of a number of mercantile firms and the loss of people's savings. Goodridge sent a request to London for a loan of a million dollars but the British replied that a Royal Commission would have to study the situation before Britain would consider aid. With this answer Goodridge resigned and the Liberals under Daniel Greene assumed office on December 13, three days after the Crash. One of the first acts of the Greene ministry was the passing of the Disabilities Removal Act which allowed all members disqualified by the Supreme Court to offer themselves as candidates in future elections.

Although the Greene administration was able to secure a short-term loan to stabilize the situation, the financial condition of the government was still precarious. The government again requested financial aid from Britain but it refused, not wanting to send money before an inquiry was carried out. Subsequently the Greene ministry resigned and William Whiteway resumed power on February 8, 1895. Whiteway re-appointed Bond as Colonial Secretary and in September Bond was returned to the House of Assembly by acclamation as member for Twillingate. Jabez Thompson had resigned his seat to allow Bond to run. Bond would represent Twillingate for the rest of his political career.

Bond spent the spring and summer of 1895 trying to find a way to improve Newfoundland's financial situation. He went to Ottawa to talk to Canadian officials about confederation between Newfoundland and Canada, but was unsuccessful when Canada refused to assume Newfoundland's public debt. Bond was able to secure a temporary loan of $150,000 in Montreal and a long term loan of $2,775,000 in London. He was also able to get a loan of $850,000 in London for the Newfoundland Savings Bank. Thus, Newfoundland managed to remain solvent. In return Newfoundland had to agree to several austerity measures including a reduction in public spending and a concerted effort to pay off the public debt. The two years which followed were difficult times for the Whiteway administration. A poor fishery resulted in fewer exports and a subsequent decline in government revenues, which made the cuts in public spending, demanded by the lending institutions, all that more necessary and widespread.

It was in the midst of this economic downswing in 1897 that Whiteway took the Liberal Party into a general election. The Liberals lost to a rejuvenated Conservative Party under the leadership of James S. Winter. Whiteway was personally defeated and, when the House of Assembly opened, Bond assumed leadership of the Liberal Party and leadership of the Opposition. The legislative sessions of 1898 and 1899 were mainly concerned with what came to be known as the "Reid Contract". For the sum of $1,000,000, Robert G. Reid acquired a 50-year monopoly on the operation of the Newfoundland railway (and ownership after those 50 years), ownership of the St. John's drydock and telegraph system, the right to operate the coastal boat service with a government subsidy, and 5,000,000 acres of crown land. Bond opposed the terms of the contract but, as Winter had a majority of members in the House, it passed the legislature. Public opposition to the contract became widespread. When the new session of the House of Assembly opened in 1900, several of Winter's supporters deserted the Conservative Party and joined the Liberals. In an ensuing vote of confidence the Winter administration was defeated and resigned. (Prime Minister Winter had the personal support of about half his caucus, while the rest were loyal to Alfred B. Morine, the Minister of Justice. Morine wanted to be Prime Minister. He made an agreement with Winter that would see Winter resign as Prime Minister by the end of 1899, and would be appointed Chief Justice upon the retirement of Sir Frederick Carter. Morine would succeed him as Prime Minister. Their deal unravelled before it could be implemented however, and enough of Morine's supporters voted with the opposition to cause Winter to lose the confidence vote.)

Robert Bond was sworn in as Prime Minister of Newfoundland on March 7, 1900. The House of Assembly was dissolved and a general election was called for November 8, 1900. Bond's major campaign issue was renegotiation of the Reid contract. Morine, who had succeeded Winter as Conservative leader, argued in favour of its retention. In an unprecedented electoral victory, Bond's party won 32 of 36 seats in the House of Assembly. One of Bond's first acts was to renegotiate the contract. Reid was forced to relinquish ownership of the telegraph service and some of the crown land, and any claim to ownership of the railway. He could operate the railway and the coastal boat service for 50 years, and had to provide streetcar service and electric street-lighting to St. John's. In return the government would return to him the $1,000,000 contract price and an additional $1,500,000 of taxpayers money.

A major setback in Bond's foreign policy, while he was Colonial Secretary in 1890-1891, had been the failure to gain British approval for the Bond-Blaine Convention. When Bond became Prime Minister he retained the post of Colonial Secretary and in August 1902 he re-established reciprocity negotiations with the United States. He held negotiations with John Hay, the U. S. Secretary of State, and they signed a tentative agreement on November 8, 1902. The Americans were given the right to purchase bait, cure their fish and recruit crew members in Newfoundland, and were permitted to have certain manufactured goods admitted duty free to Newfoundland. In return Newfoundland fish and mineral products were to be allowed into the United States without tariffs. The Bond-Hay Convention received ready approval in Newfoundland and Great Britain, but it hit a stumbling block in the U. S. Senate where the Chair of the Foreign Relations' Committee, Henry Cabot Lodge of Massachusetts, viewed its provisions as detrimental to the New England fisheries. Despite the support of President Theodore Roosevelt and attempts by him to broker a mutually-agreeable compromise, it ended with failure. The Convention was held up by the American Senate for several years. The Senate passed a modified agreement in 1905, which Newfoundland could not accept. For a second time, Bond's attempt to establish reciprocity between Newfoundland and the United States met with failure.

Another issue left unresolved from Bond's first term as Colonial Secretary was the French Shore Question. James Winter had attempted to reach a settlement during his years as Prime Minister but was unsuccessful. Bond re-opened the question soon after becoming Prime Minister; a settlement was eventually reached whereby France relinquished its rights under the Treaty of Utrecht in return for summer fishing rights and access to Newfoundland ports to obtain bait, supplies and shelter. France also received British territory in Africa as part of the agreement. This Anglo-French Convention was signed in April 1904.

Bond's first term of office as Prime Minister was a very productive one. The economy was strong and the government operated with budget surpluses from year to year. It was this success, combined with a productive fishery, a developing mining sector, advances in education and agriculture, increased shipbuilding and further exploration of the interior that Bond took with him into the election called for October 31, 1904. His campaign stressed his government's responsibility for the recent benefits to Newfoundland. His opposition was the United Opposition Party, consisting of the remnants of the Conservative Party and a number of others who were disenchanted with Bond, including his former mentor, Sir William Whiteway, and former Prime Ministers Goodridge and Winter. Donald Morison resigned his position on the Supreme Court to run against Bond in Twillingate. While the Conservatives retained the four seats they had won in 1900 and picked up two additional seats, Bond and his Liberal Party still received an overwhelming vote of confidence from the electorate, winning 30 of 36 seats.

Bond's second term began with the same positive note upon which his first term had ended. In 1905 the government reached an agreement with the Harmsworth newspaper chain of Great Britain and work soon began on the construction of a massive newsprint operation at Grand Falls. In retaliation for the failure to reach a reciprocity agreement with the United States, Bond attempted to amend the Foreign Fishing Vessels Act to prevent Americans from obtaining bait and other supplies in Newfoundland. The Americans protested this act to the British government, and Britain, not wanting to upset relations with the United States, disallowed the amendments and guaranteed the Americans the right to procure bait in Newfoundland. Bond challenged the legality of Great Britain's imposed regulations in the Newfoundland courts. The international courts at The Hague ruled in 1910 in Newfoundland's favour, an act which almost caused a major diplomatic incident between Great Britain and the United States.

The failure to achieve reciprocity with the United States was a contributing factor in the eventual decline of the Liberal Party. The party members, for the most part, had a personal loyalty to Bond. The first break in his control over the party was the resignation in 1905 of Michael Cashin, Liberal member for Ferryland. Cashin objected to Bond's tactics in amending the Foreign Fishing Vessels Act, claiming Bond introduced the amendments in the House of Assembly without discussing the matter with the caucus. Cashin crossed the floor to sit with the opposition as a Liberal independent.

The reciprocity issue may have been, ultimately, the cause of Bond's downfall. His resolute stance for reciprocity and his insistence on challenging the British regulations in the courts, resulted in the creation of enemies in Great Britain and Canada. Many officials in Great Britain were still hoping for Newfoundland's confederation with Canada, as were Canadian officials such as the Governor General, Lord Grey. In Newfoundland the Reids were strong proponents of confederation, and were opponents of Bond, mainly because of his modification of the railway contract with their company. Newfoundland's Governor, Sir William MacGregor, also favoured confederation. It was difficult for any of these officials to make public statements concerning confederation as they could be accused of interfering with Newfoundland's internal political affairs. Confederation was not a popular issue around which to build a political party, as most Newfoundlanders appeared to be opposed to the idea. The pro-confederates, both inside and outside of Newfoundland, felt that they might be able to convince Newfoundlanders of the benefits of confederation if they could get rid of Bond and replace him with a populist leader who was friendly to their cause. They thought they had found that leader in Edward Patrick Morris.

Edward Morris was first elected to the House of Assembly in 1885, joined Whiteway's new Liberal Party in 1889 and was appointed to Whiteway's Cabinet as Minister without Portfolio. Re-elected in 1893, he was one of the Liberals unseated and disqualified under the 1894 election petitions, but returned to the House of Assembly in a by-election in 1895 and was re-appointed to Cabinet. In 1898 Morris supported the Reid Contract and was the leader of a small group of Liberals who broke with Bond's leadership and voted in favour of the contract. By 1900, he had settled his differences with Bond and returned to the Liberal fold. In March 1900 he entered Bond's first Cabinet as Minister without Portfolio, and was re-elected in St. John's

West in the general election held later that year. He remained Minister without Portfolio until 1902 when he succeeded Sir William Horwood as Minister of Justice and Attorney General. He was acknowledged to be Bond's second in command.

Morris resigned from Cabinet in July 1907 and crossed the floor to sit as an independent: the reason he gave for resigning was a misunderstanding with Public Works Minister George Gushue. However, it was thought that there was an arrangement between Morris, the Reid interests, and British and Canadian officials to financially support Morris in a bid to unseat Bond as Prime Minister in the upcoming election. In return, after his election, Morris would shepherd Newfoundland into confederation. Morris was soon acknowledged as de facto leader of the opposition in the House of Assembly and in February 1908 he and Michael Cashin were joined by another Liberal defector, John R. Bennett, a colleague of Morris's from St. John's West (which elected three members). On March 5, 1908 Morris announced the formation of a new political party, the People's Party. In addition to Cashin and Bennett, four of the six Conservative Party members of the House eventually joined the People's Party, while the other two did not run in the next election, called for November 2, 1908.

Bond fought the election campaign concentrating on his record and the prosperity and stability his government had helped to provide in the previous four years. Morris had an elaborate platform promising a wide range of programs and policies. It was a hard fought campaign with most of the emphasis on the districts of Conception Bay, where candidates often won or lost by small margins. When the final results were known, each party had won 18 of the 36 seats in the assembly: a tie.

What followed was a constitutional entanglement, unprecedented in the British Empire. Morris demanded Bond's immediate resignation. Bond argued he had the right to remain in office until he was defeated in the House of Assembly. The major obstacle to calling the House into session was the dilemma over the appointment of a speaker. A speaker appointed from the Liberals would place the Party in a minority status, with one seat less than the opposition. The speaker voted only in case of a tie. The same would be true if Morris were to become Prime Minister. The House was scheduled to open on February 9, 1909, but it was delayed until February 25, as one of Bond's cabinet ministers was absent. In the meantime Bond asked Governor MacGregor for a dissolution of the House and a new election; when the Governor refused, Bond resigned. On March 3, after assurances from Morris that he could form an administration, the Governor invited him to become Prime Minister. Morris called the House into session but was unable to elect a speaker. On March 31, the Governor agreed to Morris's request for a dissolution. A new election was scheduled for May 8, 1909. The People's Party picked up eight seats, giving it a clear majority in the House with 26 seats, to the Liberal's 10. Bond spent the next four years as leader of the opposition, offering alternatives to Morris's legislative platform, but opposition was neither a place he enjoyed nor wanted to remain.

November 2, 1908, the same day as the election, the first of two meetings was held in Herring Neck, Twillingate district, resulting in the formation of the Fishermen's Protective Union. Called by William F. Coaker, a St. John's native who had become a farmer on a small island off Twillingate, the meeting's purpose was to encourage fishermen and other workers to consider the formation of a union. From these two meetings arose the Fishermen's Protective Union, with Coaker as its president. He and his colleagues spent the next few years organizing locals around the northeast and northern coasts, as far south as Conception Bay and as far north as the top of the Great Northern Peninsula. They also established the Fishermen's Advocate, a newspaper to spread their message, and the Fishermen's Union Trading Company to act as a wholesale supplier and central marketing arm of the union. At its annual convention in 1911, the membership approved the creation of a union political party to field candidates in the next election which was expected in 1913. The creation of this new political force was significant to the political career of Bond because of his past relationship with Coaker. Coaker had once been president of the Twillingate Liberal Association, and Twillingate was the district Bond represented in the House of Assembly. Bond had helped Coaker obtain a position as telegraph operator and postmaster at Herring Neck in 1897. There had been a falling out between the two, however, and Bond was quite wary of Coaker when he was approached about a possible coalition between the Liberal Party and the Union. However, an agreement was eventually reached whereby the two parties divided the seats which they would each contest. The union would field nine candidates: Bay de Verde (1 of 2), Bonavista (3), Fogo (1), Port de Grave (1), Trinity (2 of 3) and Twillingate (1 of 3). The Liberal Party would field the candidates for the other 27 seats.

Morris called a general election for October 30, 1913. In what many historians consider to be a grave tactical error, Bond campaigned in the areas in which the union was strong, instead of leaving these areas to Coaker and concentrating his campaign on the marginal seats in Conception Bay. Morris campaigned strenuously in Conception Bay and along the south coast. Morris's strategy appears to have paid off, for despite losing eight seats (Bay de Verde, Bonavista, Port de Grave and Trinity), the People's Party picked up two seats in Burin and one in St. John's East to give them a six seat majority. All Union candidates, with the exception of one who lost by 10 votes in Bay de Verde, were elected. As a result the union had one more member than the Liberals and were entitled to be the official opposition party. On January 14, 1914, before the House of Assembly opened, Bond resigned his seat. Despite several attempts to lure him back into the fray, particularly in 1919, he never again played any active role in Newfoundland political life.

After Bond retired he moved full-time to his country estate, the Grange, at Whitbourne. Whitbourne was Newfoundland's first inland town. It was established as a railway junction in 1883 when it was decided that the branch line to Harbour Grace would join the main railway line at that point. For a number of years it was known as Harbour Grace Junction. Bond acquired approximately eight square miles of land near Whitbourne shortly after the community was established, and built a small hunting lodge on the site. He later built the Grange, a large house which would become his home. Bond spent most of his time at the Grange during the intervening years. His mother took up partial residence with him during her latter years. She died at the Grange in 1900. During 1908-1909, his niece Roberta Bond, daughter of his brother George and his late wife, lived there while her father was away in China and Japan.

At the Grange, Bond attempted to create an English country estate. He planted thousands of flowering plants, shrubs and trees which were not native to Newfoundland. He experimented with various types of vegetables and imported Ayrshire cattle, raising them for their milk. The grounds were laid out with walkways and terraces, and decorated with statuary, urns, and gas lamps. In his will Bond left the estate to the people of Newfoundland, but the government of the day declined the gift. Bond's nephew, Fraser Bond, lived there occasionally until 1949 when he gave title to the new provincial government. Within a year the building had been demolished and the upkeep of the grounds ignored.

Bond was made a member of the Order of St. Michael and St. George and knighted by the Duke of Cornwall (later King George V) during his visit to St. John's in 1901. Attending the Colonial Conference in England the following year, he was sworn into the Imperial Privy Council and with it received the title *A*Right Honourable≡ for life. During this visit he was awarded an honorary doctor of laws degree from the University of Edinburgh and was granted the *A*freedom of the city≡ by London, Bristol, Manchester and Edinburgh.

Sir Robert Bond never married. He died, after a short illness, at the Grange on March 17, 1927, and was interred at Whitbourne. On September 7, 1927 a memorial service was held at the Anglican Church of St. John the Baptist, Whitbourne, where a stained-glass window was unveiled to his memory.

CUSTODIAL HISTORY

These papers were created and collected by Robert Bond during the course of his lifetime with the exception of material concerning his estate which was created by other family members in the year following his death. In his will, Bond left the bulk of his estate to his brother, George. After George's death in 1933, the estate became the property of his son, Fraser Bond. Fraser lived in New York, but spent much of his time at Whitbourne until 1949 when the Grange became the property of the Newfoundland government. Fraser Bond eventually retired to Nova Scotia. It is assumed that his uncle's papers, which had probably been housed at the Grange, went with him. Sometime before Fraser's death in 1965, he loaned Robert Bond's papers to Dr. F. F. Thompson, an historian at the Royal Military College in Kingston, Ontario. Thompson, a scholar of Newfoundland history, had published The French Shore Problem in Newfoundland: an Imperial Study (1961) and was planning to write a biography of Robert Bond. Five years after Fraser's death, Agnes O'Dea, head of the Centre for Newfoundland Studies at Memorial University, made contact with Fraser's cousin, Campbell Macpherson, former Lieutenant Governor of Newfoundland, inquiring if he would assist the University in acquiring the Bond papers. He agreed and contacted John Nichols, Fraser's nephew and executor, on the University's behalf. Nichols gave O'Dea permission to contact Thompson to arrange a transfer of the papers to Memorial on a loan basis, with negotiations to follow concerning permanent disposition.

The papers, however, remained in Thompson's possession. Over the decades, Memorial University officials made repeated attempts to acquire them through talks with Thompson and Nichols. Thompson did grant Dr. S.J.R. Noel, author of Politics in Newfoundland (1971), access to the papers, and also granted Dr. James Hiller of Memorial University a cursory glance in the early 1980s. Subsequent requests for access by Hiller were denied. Thompson's response to Hiller was that the papers were closed "pending sale". Hiller recalled Thompson telling him "that though the legal possession of the papers might lie with the family, he [Thompson] felt he had a strong moral claim, if only because he had, so he said, virtually created the collection." Attempts to gain access by other researchers also met with failure.

In 1995 Dr. George Nichols, brother of John Nichols, in response to an article in the St. John's Evening Telegram, contacted Thompson with the intention of having the papers returned to the jurisdiction of the family and returned to Newfoundland. Thompson and Nichols reached agreement on a plan of action but before it could be executed, Nichols died.

In October 1996, the Centre for Newfoundland Studies was contacted by Randell Nelson, George Nichols's son-in-law, on behalf of Joan E. Nichols, George's widow, concerning presentation of the Robert Bond papers to Memorial University. The deed of gift was executed on November 12, 1996, transferring ownership of the papers to Memorial University. The papers were received by the Centre for Newfoundland Studies shortly thereafter.

ARRANGEMENT AND DESCRIPTION

The Robert Bond papers arrived at the Centre for Newfoundland Studies Archives in 27 banker boxes, not all of which were filled. Some of the papers were contained in file folders labelled by subject matter and date; others were loose. The arrangement that existed appears to be imposed by F.F. Thompson and in some cases, file folders and the materials were annotated by Thompson. These notes have been left in the pertinent files.

The papers have been arranged in 12 series: two personal, nine political and one of photographs. This arrangement reflects his life, interests and career and all are chronological within the series and subseries.

Series 1 consists of material related to the Bond family and includes a fairly extensive correspondence between Robert Bond and his brother, Rev. George Bond, and George's children, Roberta and Fraser.

Series 2 consists of material related to Bond's personal life, including his education, financial matters, mining interests, the Grange, and his death.

Series 3 consists of material related to his political career, his involvement with political parties and his campaign material from the various elections in which he was a candidate and includes speeches, campaign ephemera, correspondence and newspaper clippings.

Series 4 consists of material related to general political issues: fisheries, education, land use and exploitation of natural resources.

Series 5 consists of material related to Bond's government service, including his appointments to the Executive Council, his Knighthood, the Royal Visit of 1901 and his attendance at the Coronation of Edward VII in 1902 and colonial conferences in 1902 and 1907. Material ranges from large vellum certificates of appointment to place cards for seating at state dinners.

Series 6 consists of material related to the French Shore and ranges from historical research to ongoing attempts to have the French expelled during the latter 19th and early 20th centuries.

Series 7 consists of material related to Bond=s involvement in negotiations with United States government officials over reciprocity agreements in the 1890s and early 1900s., and includes correspondence, treaties, statistics, articles and speeches and newspaper clippings.

Series 8 consists of material related to Newfoundland=s relations with Canada between 1865 and 1915, including various attempts to have Newfoundland become part of the Canadian Confederation, materials concerning the Labrador boundary dispute and the Halifax Conference of 1892.

Series 9 consists of material related to the failure of two Newfoundland banks in 1894 and the aftermath of this collapse.

Series 10 consists of material related to the construction of the railway and telegraph lines in Newfoundland, including Bond=s opposition to and re-negotiation of the contracts with the Reid Company.

Series 11 consists of material related to Bond=s interests and involvement in an all British trans-Atlantic shipping route which would include Newfoundland as a trans-shipment point.

Series 12 consists of photographs (positives and negatives) including Bond family members and friends, the Grange, Newfoundland communities and scenery, and pictures taken in England and Ireland. The work of photographers such as Robert Holloway, James Vey, Philip Figary and W. J. Scott are in evidence.

Newspaper clippings retained in the collection, except for those glued in large albums, have been photocopied and the originals (most of which were in a brittle or deteriorating condition) were discarded. Appendix A gives a list of newspapers and published books which were part of the collection but were transferred to more appropriate repositories.
