Enough Is Enough:
A Time for Truths about Child Protection:
A Response to the Turner Review
with Dr Ken Barter

This presentation brings forward relevant and critical concerns about child protection and social work that are grounded in the literature and research. Given these concerns are not acknowledged in the Turner Report, it is important to bring them forward for clarification and information. The presentation sounds the call for action in bringing about change that will facilitate and support the important role that social workers play as the predominant profession in child protection work. Evidence is provided as to why it is time for this change to take place. The presentation also contextualizes the known realities of child protection work, realities that are often skirted when changes are introduced.

Ken Barter, BA, MSW, PhD is a Professor with the School of Social Work, Memorial University of Newfoundland. Ken worked for 30 years in public child welfare systems in Newfoundland, Northwest Territories, and Prince Edward Island, working in front line, supervision, management, and social policy positions, before entering academia in 1995.
